Harper's Bazar.

New York Fashions.

Corsettes are most varied in detail, scarcely any two being alike. The only settled fact is that all basques are shorter, except those that are cut in English coat shape, to serve as a street garment without an extra wrapping.

The front has two darts, but no cross basque seam, and this sometimes compels the use of an under-arm dart, which gives the effect of two side seams in the back. The first side body begins in the armhole, and in many cases the second also; but the long side forms beginning in the shoulder seams have proved so becoming to most figures that the attempt to give them up has been a failure, as many ladies insist upon having them. There are, however, fewer seams in the back than when the long corsetlike cut was so popular. The middle seam is now more regular, though the use of a seam is still insisted upon, and the use of a
